

Left—A very unusual photograph showing the deadly results of German machine gun fire when the Russians tried to break through the Hun wire entanglements in the recent charge. Two of the Russians have managed to get through the first row of wire, but German bullets caught them before they could make the second. In this particular attack the Russians failed to break through the German lines, but the trench itself was taken by their fellow troops, who attacked at less strongly protected points. © Donald C. Thompson, Central News.

On the right—French poilu enjoying a moment's relaxation on the fire step of his front line trench. Note the overhead netting for shrapnel protection. Int. Film.

Above—A wrecked Boche aeroplane makes a splendid clothes-horse for this Canadian Tommy on the British front. Western Newspaper Union.

On the right—A French anti-aircraft battery in their sand-bagged emplacement just back of the first line trenches. Pict. Press.

Below—An old sewing machine, rescued from the ruins of a French village, and a signpost make up the complete equipment of this Canadian tailor Tommy on the Western front. Western Newspaper Union.

Somewhere in France—An American Sammy comes out of his camouflaged tent to greet the photographer. Fr. Off. Pict. Press.

On the right—French tank under heavy German bombardment. Two different kinds of shells have almost found their mark—the high explosive close to the ground, and overhead, the shrapnel. Kodel & Herbert.

